Most buying stations and farmers alike gearing up for harvest which should be well under way in another week if the weather holds. Some buying stations expect to see a few trucks by weekend but generally trying to get producers to hold off as seed is still carrying slightly more moisture than they prefer to see. Much of the seed in the southeast was put in rows to dry since last week. Farmers in the northeast part of the state are fighting record flooding and high water. Hay harvest in all parts of the state is still much behind normal progress which could provide several more fescue acres. With the potential high yield of seed available and the very weak seed market buying stations are backing up bids as harvest nears, most stations now projecting prices of .43 cwt wet and .45 cwt for dry seed.
